Zuken did not announce the immediate availability of the CR-5000, but said it will be available in the fourth quarter of 2010. Zuken issued a press release Monday that stated the company is delaying CR-5000's availability by six to eight months. "The delivery of this industry's first CAD/CAM/CAE integrated solution for multi-domain design has been pushed back to the fourth quarter of 2010," the release stated. "Accordingly, it will no longer be available as a standalone product in the current fiscal year." "We apologize for the delay. However, CR-5000 will continue to play an important role in our overall product strategy going forward," said Steve Carroll, vice president of product management at Zuken. The delay is attributed to Zuken's need to complete all testing and calibration of the device. Zuken will continue to support CR-5000 until the scheduled ship date. Carroll said that the delay in the release of CR-5000 is due to the fact that Zuken plans to launch other products in the fourth quarter, a period when it is more difficult to attract new customers. "Based on the results of market research, we feel that the best solution is to postpone the CR-5000 release until Q4 of 2010 and then expand CR-5000 to other market segments," Carroll said. "We have a backlog of customers who have pre-ordered the CR-5000 and we don't want to disappoint them. The business needs of our customers is our No. 1 priority." Zuken has previously stated that it will not pursue a strategy of selling directly to OEMs, which represent 70 percent of the electronics market. Instead, the company plans to sell directly to its value customers, including OEMs, industrial and defense companies. On Wednesday, Zuken was targeted by an attorney for leading defense companies in an attempt to stop the company from releasing a defense technology. The company is expected to file a civil lawsuit against the attorney, as well as the law firm and the CEO. Carroll said Zuken does not believe the lawsuit has merit and that the company is confident that it will be successful in court. According to the company, Zuken plans to release the new tablet in 2010, targeting the design, production and marketing of electronic and semiconductor components. The company plans to introduce the new product at trade shows in the fourth quarter of 2010, though 82157476af
